An action tale set during the height of the Rwandan genocide

After several years in the Navy SEALs and now a reserve officer in Naval Intelligence, Craig Hobart parachutes alone into Rwanda, weeks after the 1994 genocide against Tutsis has started.

It is strictly a solo mission. He did not inform his superiors about his plan, which isn't really a plan, but a deep desire to help, since nobody else seems to be doing anything. It is a civil war in everything, but name.

Early on he meets a Tutsi man and his daughter, who escaped their village, after all the inhabitants were massacred by Hutu militias. They become the core of his little guerrilla unit.

The group grows steadily, starting with the first shootout with the Hutus. More weapons are 'liberated' from army and militia convoys, on dirt roads among the famed Rwandan hills. With time, Craig develops a crush on a pretty, young Tutsi widow.

After unexpectedly meeting the CIA Kigali station chief, their hopes and ambitions grow and a truck convoy with hundreds of Tutsis heads north, out of Rwanda.

Meanwhile, they receive information about a bank official, with truckloads of Rwandan gold bars, salvaged from the national bank in Kigali and meet a museum director, trying to save precious Tutsi artifacts.

- The genocide in Rwanda was very real
- Practically nothing was done in order to stop it

Even though Craig's solo attempt to save as many lives as he could constitutes a fictional account, the story is closely based on real events.

There is a lot of fighting, death and shooting, but Craig and the CIA make a serious effort to confine the killing to the actual perpetrators – the Rwandan militias and the military.
